Waves
by Pamela Waterbury

Long after the car disappeared, I still waved goodbye to her as my grandmother waved off my mother, and my mother me,
each of us leaving for another world.

Once my daughter’s hand held in mine, we waved “bye-bye” to her grandmother.
With those leavings came returns, like waves on Lake Michigan’s shoreline until the final no return of her grandmother’s life.

On summer days, my daughter followed the waves, out and back to shore on sturdy legs.
Water tumbled grainy sand and quartz against her ankles while riptide currents lurked just beneath.

At the grade school, I stood watching her disappear behind heavy doors.
On the surface she floated back, but already the current tugged her into deeper water.

Now she carries her belongings to a new room, a new life, on a distant shore,
our visits ending with my hand raised to her receding form.

Watching the stillness of frozen water bent and peaked on the lake in this gray February cold, I imagine the currents underneath, the thaw, and once again waves against the shore.

Running in Montpellier: Winter
by Pamela Waterbury

Like a widow layered in black, weighted, under hat and mittens, disguised and hidden, she runs into this snow world. Prepared for hills, but not this storm. Not the below zero air harsh in her lungs. Not this danger lurking under each safe-seeming surface.
Constant surveillance for bumpy ground, slick packed-snow, and black ice patches exhaust her.

In the city, the murky slush slows her pace; the stop-start of dodging a woman lugging groceries, a stalled truck makes her feel the dampness from neck to toe. Not the freeing summer wetness from even pacing, long strides—vigilance earns this sweat.
Like a burka, her tightly wrapped scarf conceals her from strangers’ stares.

No digressions on these runs, predictable patterns. The exterior world a blur, only feet lifting and lowering and breath.
Heavy clothes sealing off the cold weight her body
as she ascends the hill, feet allowing only brief spurts of runs.
Her mind focuses on the in and out breath—pants of labor.

No triumph of a quick spurt ends the run, only the plodding of one step and the next brings her to the top of the hill. Pulling off the veil of her hood she looks back at the frozen world. In her room, clothes shed, she’s momentarily lightened, returned Grandmother’s Hands

by Pamela Waterbury

As teens my hands slept slathered in Vaseline and white gloves.
I wanted them lacey to utter like a light breeze through aspen leaves; hands elegant among the china she gave me; delicately fingering facets on cut glass bowls; or a lover’s sinewed back not these competent hands, gifts from my Germanic grandmother, tarnished with wrinkles, prominent blue veins, arthritic angles and bumps, square-shaped with stubby fingers fanning off a broad palm.

Forgetting gloves, they scrub kitchen floors, scrape crusted food off pans, twist stubborn lids, dig in garden dirt rooting out weeds.
They leave trails of pencil conversations on student papers, knit a daughter’s scarf for years at a time.

Nails never perfectly groomed, reveal the white ridges of my grandmother’s.
Each day I watch for the familia tremors—legacies she gave to my mother, a shaking that kept her from her paints—to overtake my hands as they lift a coffee mug or put down the first line of a poem.

Pamela Waterbury is an Assistant Professor at Aquinas College in Grand Rapids, Michigan, where she teaches English courses (Creative Writing and Introduction to Poetry), Humanities, and English Education courses (Youth Literature and the Writing Practicum). She received her MFA in Creative Writing at Vermont College.