

SUBMITTING MANUSCRIPTS TO THE SMITHFIELD REVIEW

Do you have a manuscript—or do you want to write one—that you would like to see published as an article in this journal? The Smithfield Review invites the submission of manuscripts on subjects pertaining to the pre-1950s history of the various peoples living west of the Blue Ridge Mountains, both in Virginia and neighboring states.

Each article should be based on the author’s original research into the subject, explain why the subject is significant to the region, and contain reference notes indicating sources of the information used by the author. Your subject need not be well known to be significant. Think of our region as a patchwork quilt of many colors and differently shaped pieces, which, when combined, reveal how striking is the past of both our ancestors and our area.

If accepted for publication, your work would appear in a printed volume like this one. It would also be available to readers and researchers throughout the world in our online version at scholar.lib.vt.edu/ejournals/smithfieldreview/.

Preparing and Submitting Manuscripts or Sharing Ideas for One with the Editor

You may inquire via e-mail about an article idea or submit your manuscript as an attachment to the editor at history@vt.edu. Please prepare your manuscript(s) in Microsoft Word, double-spaced, using the Times New Roman font and twelve-point type; place references at the end in the form of endnotes. Manuscripts for regular articles should be twenty to thirty pages; longer manuscripts may appear in multiple parts published in multiple volumes. In addition to regular and multi-part articles, TSR publishes informative shorter pieces as brief notes. The journal also invites texts of speeches, reviews of books, and transcriptions of hand-written manuscripts related to the history of the region.

Upon request, the editor can send you a description of the editorial process and the format for graphics you may want included within your article. TSR generally follows the Chicago Manual of Style.

The editorial board and I look forward to hearing from you.
